Lightroom reads and is built upon RAW files. LR's raw workflow is one of its biggest selling point. i.e. if you do not want or need to open raw files in a separate editor, it's probably not the tool for you. Both of these situations have either serious workflow or speed benefits over trying to do both things at once using separate raw editors and overlaying the two layers. So, if you have dual monitors or even just a large screen, please give your monitor to the library and save yourself some screen real estate. There are always trade offs in the use of apps on the iPad – they are still quite a few years behind Mac's in performance. In Lightroom, you have more than one monitor or even a larger screen, and multiple processors to work with. The iPad Lags behind with only one CPU and one chip. Private networks are the key to keeping your home office from being a time suck, but they are also a pain to build. The new Tomb Raider 2 HG-T2F controller from Asustor does away with all that. It gives you a built-in NAS drive that's ready to go with a choice of SSDs, and it supports those drives in RAID 1. No need to mount a traditional network-attached storage drive to the server. It can be network-attached right out of the box. Dell sells gaming systems for PC enthusiasts who want far more power than consoles or an integrated GPU can provide. These Dell XPS system are more than capable gaming machines, too: They are exceptionally fast, quiet, and still have the latest hardware. That's a combination that sells itself.
